HOW YOUR VOTE IN MAY CAN MAKE OUR STREETS SAFER

Putting women and girls first

Women and girls deserve to know they're safe, no matter where they are or what they're doing.

That's why the government is investing millions to tackle violence against women and girls, punish domestic abusers and keep the worst criminals off our streets.

The Conservatives have introduced tough new laws — doubling the maximum sentence for stalking, criminalising the act of sharing intimate photos without consent, and tightening laws around domestic abuse.

So police and judges have the power to keep dangerous criminals off our streets.

At the same time, the government is increasing the support they give to victims, investing over £230 million to help those who have suffered from domestic abuse.

INSIDE: The facts about Labour's record on crime...

DR JAMES DAVIES MP: "POLICE VISIBILITY IS KEY"

Ending automatic early release for the worst criminals. Tougher punishments for abuse. Keeping criminals off our streets. The government has introduced tough new sentences to keep Brits safe and keep dangerous criminals off our streets.

By ending automatic early release for the worst criminals, including child killers and terrorists, the Conservatives are helping to make every community safer.

The government has also introduced new laws to protect women and girls. These include doubling the maximum sentence for stalking, criminalising the act of sharing intimate photos, and tightening laws around domestic abuse.

Here in North Wales, Dr James Davies MP has stressed that police visibility is vital. There are more police officers than ever before but antisocial behaviour (ASB) in particular remains a blight in many communities.

That's why, as MP for the Vale of Clwyd, he has worked so hard to bring police back into the heart of Prestatyn — with a new police station due to open later this year. As Conservative candidate for the new seat of Clwyd East, he is listening to the needs of Holywell, Llangollen and Mold, as well as rural areas, to ensure that ASB can be better tackled there also.

These actions are helping to make everyone safer, no matter where they are or what they're doing.
